The National Institute on Deafness and Other Communication Disorders (NIDCD) became the 13th Institute mandated by Congress within the National Institutes of Health in October of 1988. NIDCD conducts and supports research and training with respect to disorders of hearing and other communication processes, including diseases affecting hearing, balance, voice, speech, language, taste, and smell. This support occurs through a diversity of research performed in its own laboratories and a program of research grants, individual and institutional research training awards, career development awards, center grants, and contracts given to public and private research institutions and organizations.

The Institute collaborates with professional, commercial, voluntary, and philanthropic organizations concerned with research and training that is related to deafness and other communication disorders; disease prevention and health promotion; and the special biomedical and behavioral problems associated with communication impairments or disorders.

Through the support of efforts to create devices which substitute for lost and impaired sensory and communication functions, and the ongoing collection and dissemination of information to health professionals, patients, industry, and the public on research findings in these areas, the Institute strives to achieve the highest in scientific and humanitarian endeavors.
